*Of the ones that are the wall
that are the many,
Which are you?
The small, the red, the singular, placed ever higher on Another, Supported,
Placed carefully, placed securely —
You are held by that around you and yourself.
What?*

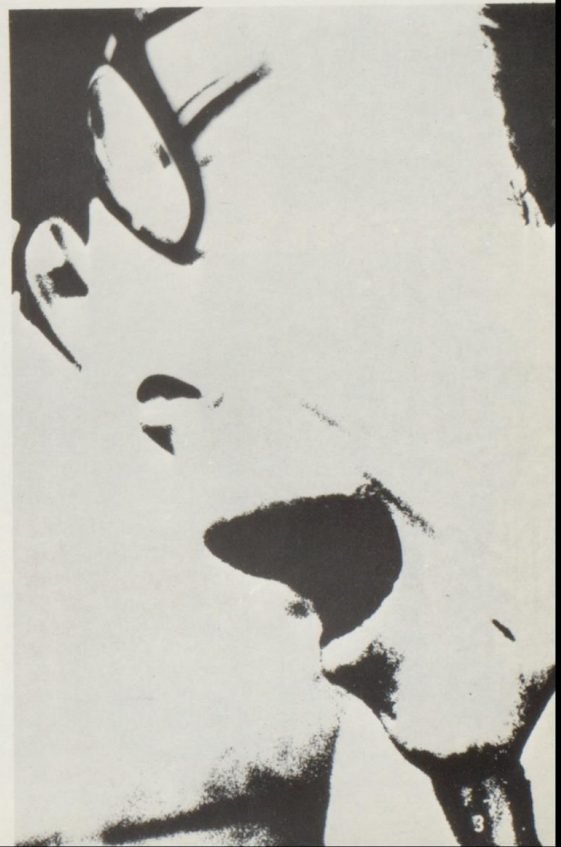

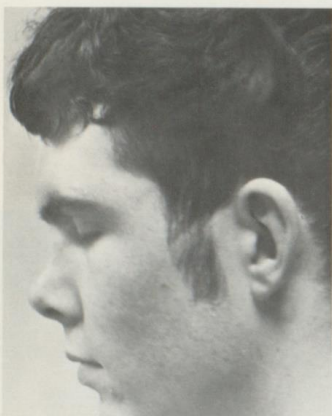

*Of done, and all the doing —
 along your length
 Are the many.
 Of the ones that are the many,
 which are you?*

*Look — and they are yet singular;
 The faces are not all even — jutting —
 angling off —
 Textured by the done,
 by all the doing.*

*Of the ones that are the wall
that are the many,
Which
Are you?
You are units of all the rest of all the many
But
They are part of you.*

"WE SWEAR IT'S NOT TOO LATE!"

In Memoriam

William L. Callahan, Jr.

A sense of humor to enliven his class and a concern for each individual endeared Mr. Callahan to his students. He was interested in many projects and actively participated in them, as an English teacher, as a Driver's Education teacher, as the Hire the Handicapped Contest coordinator, and as an ardent basketball fan.

Editorial

We began work on the Herald this fall with the belief that the yearbook could be more than a pleasant picture-book; it could have some meaning and relevance. When the time came to select a theme, then, we had to decide exactly what meaning the book would have. The group began to polarize into two groups: those who wanted to stress the good times, the good teachers, the real communication between students and faculty in the high school and those who wanted to stress the bad times, the indoctrination, and the lack of real communication in the school. After a month of arguing and heavy casualties on each side, we reached a compromise. We would not deny indoctrination, and neither would we expand it beyond the truth; we would not expand the good parts beyond truth, and neither would we deny they existed. We decided to deal with the relation of the individual to high school and to society in general. Our presentation would be neither black nor white, all good nor all bad, but, as we saw it, truthful.

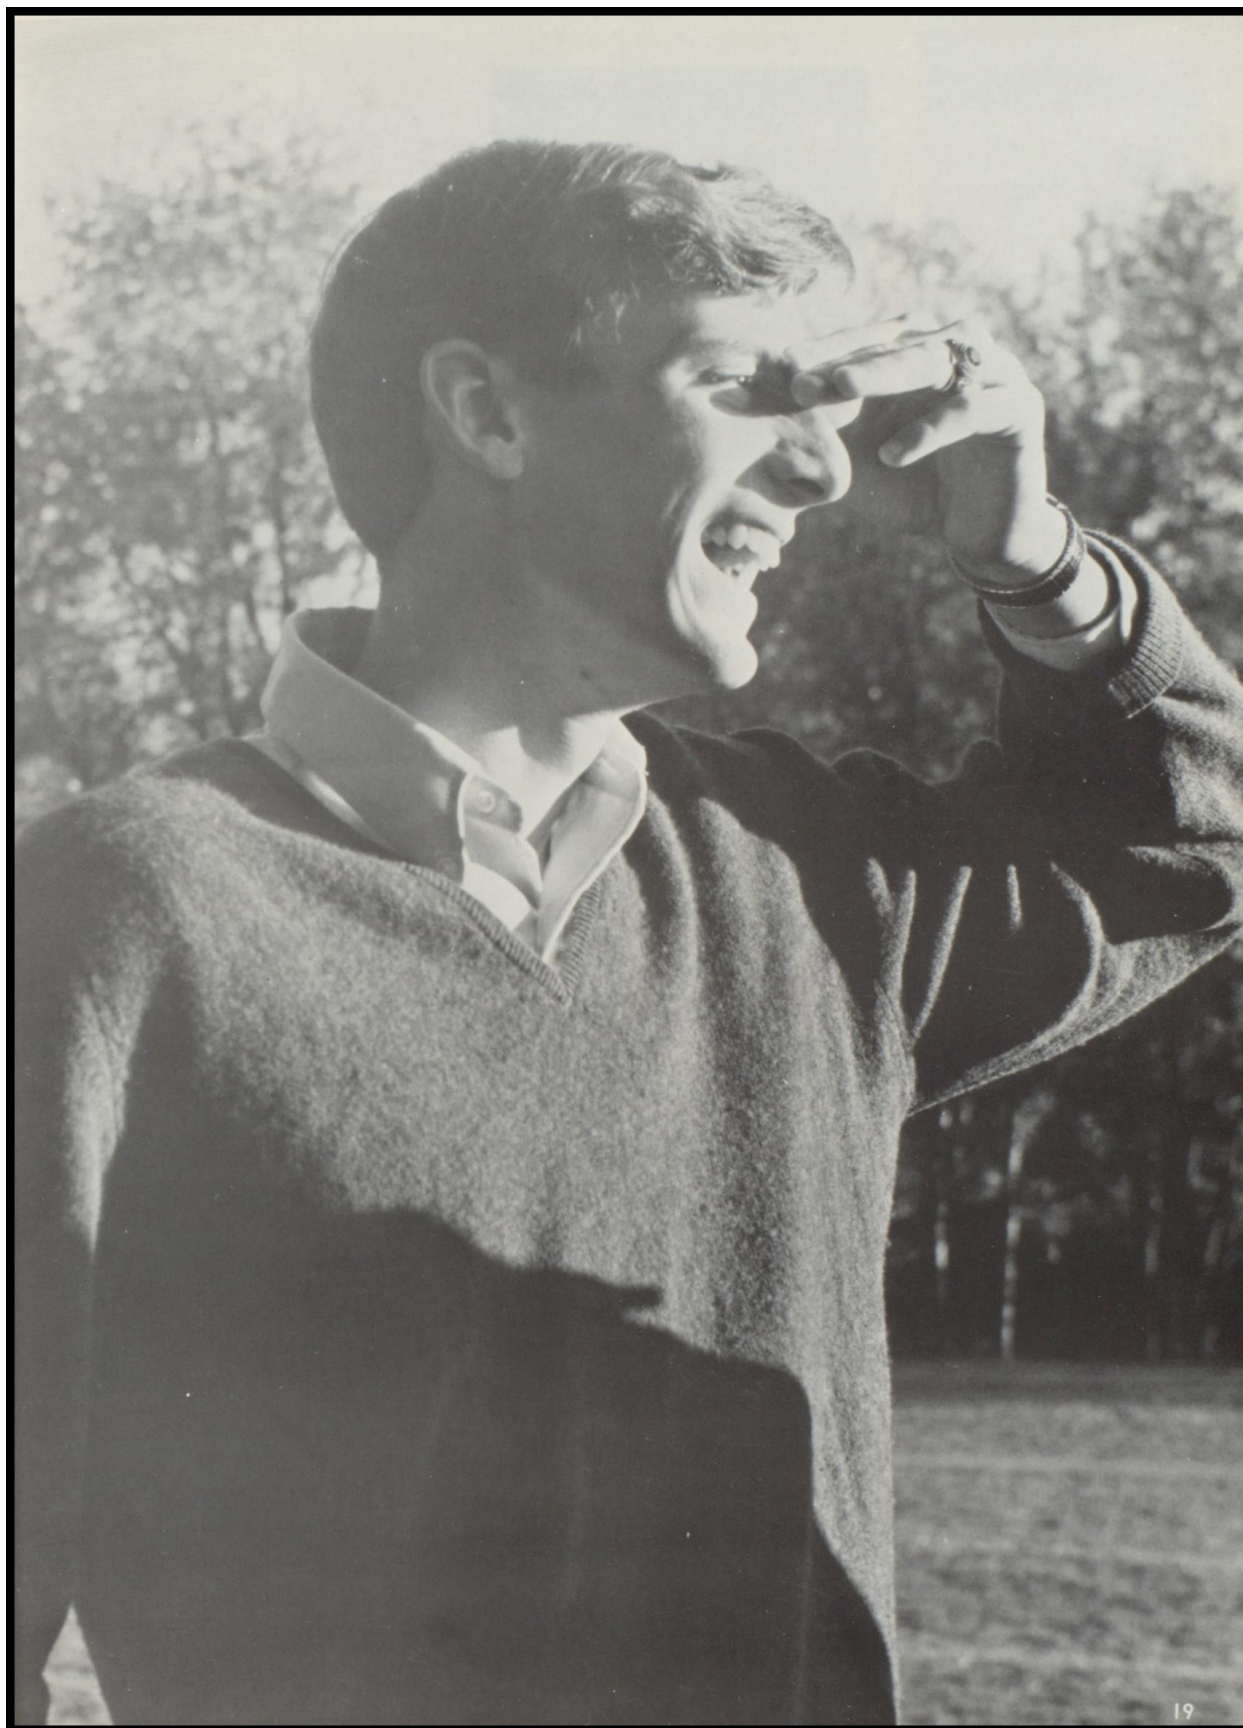

The presentations were varied and sometimes confused, but one thing was common to them all and foremost in them all, and that thing was people. Neither the high school, nor the society, nor the institutions of that society existed as huge, inhuman blocks, but were all made of people. Thus an individual's problem was not to fit into and relate to a thing called society, but to fit in with and relate to other individuals.

We know that there are problems involved in fitting in with other people. Can a person reconcile his individuality with the needs and desires of other people? If so, how? We believe that a person can fit in and still retain his individuality. How? That is not a question we can answer. Each person must find his own answers to that question.
